His Thick Hide Penetrated.

We are glad that Mr. Speaker REED is hard it is to not so thick-skinned as we had supposed him to be. In the North American Review for March-at the request no doubt of the contrary, he has adopted the false plea, so often made in the House of Representatives by his own partisans whilst the was without rules, that the rulings which he made were made in obedience to the Constitution. This plan is a suggestio falst. "If," says Mr. Reed, "if by any chance there is not a quorum, the Constitution provides's way to get 'It is not," he continues, "by recording those present as voting either year or nay, but by making the absent present." And yet, though Mr. REED bimself did not say that he counted those present as having as present members enough to make up a quorum when counted with the Republi cans voting. In other words, though Mr. REED pretended not to count the votes of the silent members on his own side, yet the effect of his tyrannical act of counting them as present was exactly the same as if he had counted the silent members as voting with the Republicans in every instance in which it was necessary for REED to manufacture by his arbitrary counting a quorum not otherwise obtainable Mr. Rugo's statement that "if by any chance there is not a quorum, the Constitution provides a way to get one," is not strictly accurate. It suggests rather than states a positive falsehood. It conveys to of the House, for sending the officers of This is not true. The Constitution merely empowers the House to provide how a e language of that instrument is: "A majority of each [house] shall constitute a ] quorum to do business; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and was there any rule of the House in force which authorized him to count as present members who on a yea-and-nay vote had declined to answer to their names. Such a rule has since been adopted by the House; but it can have no retroactive offect. It cannot be invoked to justify wrongs committed in the absence of rules. Note, too, that the Constitution does not empower less than a quorum to compel the silent members to vote, but contents itself with empowering such minority to compel the attendance of absent members. The Constitution goes with Mr. Reed so far as to allow a minority to compel the attendance of absent members, but it goes no farther. The same Constitution provides

The Constitution goes with Mr. Reed so far as to allow a minority to compel the attendance of absent members, but it goes no farther. The same Constitution provides that when the two houses are assembled in joint session to count the votes for President and the property of the Hastings are a significant members of the Hastings bar, a prominent member of the Has that when the two houses are assembled in joint session to count the votes for President and Vice-President of the United States, "the President of the Senate shall."

• open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." Here, said Mr. Conkinks in 1877, the Constitution goes with the President of the Senate until it comes to the provision for counting the votes, and then "it turns its back upon him." It does not say that the President of the Senate shall open the certificates and count the votes, but that he shall open the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted. We borrow Mr. Conkinn's strongly-illustrative phrase, and say that the Constitution goes with Mr. Reep until would be done when the members were brought together. If they declined to vote, New that was a matter between them and their

The statement of Diek Hawes who, was hanged in Birmingham, Ala., on Friday last for the munder of his wife and two daughters, is a lengthy affair. It consists of thirty-two pages of foolsean and fifteen pages of note paper. Every page is closely written and every word is in Hawes's own handwriting, and at two separate places is affirmed as being the whole truth over his signatures, R. R. Hawes.

The statement begins with a story of his life, giving his parentage and place of birth. His career is traced along through his various occupations and employments to the hour of his marriage. Hawes de-clares everything went on well until whis-key commenced playing have with his wile's good behavior and his own happi-ness. Whiskey rained him and brought should have the same justice as a rich man."

Mr. Wyly was then asked why it was that Hawes should have followed him so.

"The reason is very plain." he said: "If it had not been for me Hawes would to day have been a free man. When I was in jail an escape was planned. Hawes tried to get me into it. As my release was certain and assent to a jail escape would have been oriminal I refused. This brought upon me oriminal I refused. This brought upon me in the implacable hatred of Hawes, who made up his mind that I should suffer.

"Why, one of the strongest proofs that Hawes was lying whon he charged me with the offence hes in this circumstance. When Hawes became convinced that the end was certain and that no hope remained for him he sent for Father Daly. Of course the first thing the priest insists upon is full confession. As he visited the prisoner frequently, and the two seemed to be in accord, it is fair to presume that such confession was made. After this Hawes made the statement that I was implicated; the priest quit him. Why? If the priest was at liberty to tell the secrets of the confessional it would be that he knew Hawes was the statement that I was impreased, the priest quit him. Why? If the priest was at liberty to tell the secrets of the confessional it would be that he knew Hawes was iving wifully when he brought my name into the case, and knowing that, and that his penitent was incorrigible, he quit him. I am innocent, and intend to remain right here."
